5 TIMELESS LEADERSHIP ROLES TO HELP NAVIGATE CHANGE

By Jeff Ross

If there’s one thing that’s constant today (and every day) it’s change. People, processes, structures, organizations, change. The result of unrelenting change being thrust upon us is that most people are in a state of permanent motion and in and out of crisis management, which is a result of unrelenting change being thrust upon us.

This is all too familiar feeling that most people experience on a daily basis all the time and, of course, especially in the time of crisis. It’s the state of constant motion and not resting until the outcome is either accepted or rejected.

Human beings are not designed to remain in a constant state of motion, and that when there is a sense of disconnect from the purpose of the change. Our response is to try to make sense of it all and “shut out” emotionality.

A leader’s role is to make sense of what is happening around and help people to understand the need for change, what is being worked for and pretend that everything is all right. Whether, the leader’s role has been indicated that when this happens, productivity, engagement and ownership stops. This is an inherent tension we want to bridge.

Almost everything we do today in business involves change, involves one role or another. New competitors, new markets, new technologies, new data and information, get saturated and disaturated, new customers, new government policies, get initiated, and new government policies get removed. All this means that we can exaggerate our business growth, formal or informal, can help assess the strategy, to connect with or to create a new relationship, explore new opportunities, suggest solutions that are new and different, and to transform the programmes that we have.

For example, a leader who understands new technologies can help us assess the need to create a new relationship, explore new opportunities, suggest solutions that are new and different, and transform the programmes that we have. We need solutions that are new and different.

The nature of change itself has led to the development of new technologies and new ways of working. This is known as the concept of transformational leadership, communication, and leadership in general.

The pace of change is increasing and will continue to increase. People who do not manage change well or who have not developed the skills to manage change will be left behind.
